

Doc. ...

Provisional version

22 January 2019

The value of cultural heritage in a democratic society

Report¹

Committee on Culture, Science, Education and Media

Rapporteur: Alexander [the Earl of] DUNDEE, United Kingdom, European Conservatives Group

A. Draft resolution²

1. The Parliamentary Assembly maintains that cultural diversity and the richness of cultural heritage are important assets for European economies and societies. It recalls the Council of Europe Framework Convention on the Value of Cultural Heritage for Society (CETS No.199, Faro Convention). This promotes a wider understanding of cultural heritage and its relationship to communities and society. It also emphasises the importance of cultural heritage as it relates not only to the economies of regions and local communities but also to human rights and democracy within Europe and its states.

2. Within Resolution 2123 (2016) and Recommendation 2093 (2016) on “Culture and democracy”, the Parliamentary Assembly broadens the definition of culture. This includes spiritual, material, intellectual and emotional features which characterise a society. Thereby covered are not only cultural heritage, the arts and letters, but also life-styles, habits of thinking and acting, value systems, traditions and beliefs. Seen in this context, culture then becomes a powerful tool to encourage constructive thought, to initiate public debate and to strengthen democratic practice.

3. The Assembly considers that culture and heritage have a useful role to play in regions and localities - sustaining their economies; improving cooperation with their communities; and inspiring better and more creative solutions to their everyday problems - but only if decision makers in the public and private sectors are sensitive to their value. Therefore it emphasises the core principles of the Faro Convention, indicating that these be widely used and implemented locally, whether in towns, cities or in rural areas.

4. Accordingly, the Assembly recommends that member States of the Council of Europe should:

4.1. sign and ratify the Council of Europe Framework Convention on the Value of Cultural Heritage for Society (CETS No.199, Faro Convention), if they have not already done so;

4.2. assist local authorities to deploy the principles laid down in the convention as well as within Recommendation CM/Rec(2017)1 which launches the European Heritage Strategy for the 21st Century, and also at State level encouraging policies:

4.2.1. to promote a greater degree of inclusiveness within a wider range of expression in order to maximise the useful contribution which culture can make within the State;

4.2.2. to direct culture and heritage in more effective ways into education, employment, economy, research and innovation, social services, health and welfare;

4.2.3. to combine strategies and actions for local sustainable development; these endeavours coming together over different sectors; thus between them reflecting a new spirit of cooperation which seeks to overcome restrictions all too often present within national legislation and instead to provide necessary support and incentives which can then lead to constructive outcomes;

¹ Reference to committee: Doc. 14026, Reference 4226 of 24 June 2016.

² Draft resolution adopted unanimously by the committee on 22 January 2019.

4.2.4. to review and update education curricula and vocational training so that they respond properly to changing employment needs within the cultural sector: allowing for a stronger combination of arts, economy, technology and science to be formed in order to stimulate a much more convincing extent of interaction between technologies, the creative arts and entrepreneurship.

5. The Assembly thus recommends that local and regional authorities:

5.1. develop sustainable development strategies using culture and heritage as core elements;

5.2. promote a positive vision of culture and its ability to broaden skills and innovative approaches to economy;

5.3. are not restrained by any unnecessary and arbitrary division between culture and economy;

5.4. bring together a wide range of associations and participants in order to agree upon shared objectives for local development;

5.5. encourage partnerships between industries, cultural institutions, local schools and vocational training so that young people become involved, especially over redevelopment projects in deprived areas;

5.6. persuade cultural institutions to involve many more people within their programmes and to explore new forms of engagement within the community through their outreach services;

5.7. facilitate additional opportunities for jobs and skills within the cultural and heritage sectors, by providing incentives for new "creative spaces", relevant local education modules, effective partnerships and training;

6. The Assembly pays tribute to the key part played by the Congress of Local and Regional Authorities of the Council of Europe, to its existing achievements through cooperation to address the challenges facing the cultural and democratic life of cities and rural areas. For its part, the Assembly will promote such co-operation, notably in connection with the four awards which make up the Europe Prize.

7. Following the success of the European Year of Cultural Heritage 2018, the Assembly invites the European Union to initiate further cooperation with the Council of Europe over the forthcoming European Action Plan for Cultural Heritage and the new Agenda for Culture, and also with European and international city networks and associations to promote the implementation of the Faro principles within local and regional sustainable development projects.

8. The Assembly also invites the European Union to consider whether existing funding programmes that cut across several Directorates General (Regional and Urban Policy; Education, Audio-visual and the Culture Executive Agency; Education Youth Sport and Culture; and Employment, Social Affairs and inclusion), might be reviewed; this is in order to coordinate those programmes more efficiently so that the funded projects themselves could be more coherent and better coordinated in order to serve as best practice examples for other European cities or regional areas.

B. Draft recommendation³

1. The Parliamentary Assembly, referring to its Resolution ... on the value of cultural heritage in a democratic society, considers culture and heritage to be central to democratic stability in Europe today. For at any times culture and heritage move and inspire people. Not least, at moments of economic uncertainty or recession, are they also powerful beacons of light to raise hope and to nourish identity and belonging. The Assembly therefore urges that the Council of Europe should devote resources to pursue in this regard its longstanding work with member States.

2. The Council of Europe Framework Convention on the Value of Cultural Heritage for Society (CETS No.199, Faro Convention), the European Heritage Strategy for the 21st century (Strategy 21), the Council of Europe Cultural Routes Programme and the European Heritage Days all provide an excellent framework. This is for advancing cultural heritage, backed up by the policies of member States within which culture and cultural heritage can be placed at the core of sustainable development strategies at local and regional levels.

3. The Assembly therefore recommends that the Committee of Ministers:

3.1. re-enforce the support to existing Council of Europe programmes in the culture and cultural heritage field including for technical assistance programmes in order to support public authorities within member States with targeted policy review, legal advice and other initiatives;

3.2. build up much better co-operation with the European Union within the framework of the forthcoming European Action Plan for Cultural Heritage and the new Agenda for Culture with a view to stimulate innovation and carry out forward-looking initiatives in the culture and cultural heritage field which aim at community building and inclusiveness.

4. The Assembly considers that the momentum gathered during the European Year of Cultural Heritage 2018 represents the opportunity to build stronger partnerships with the European Union to raise the level of ambition in the cultural field, so that culture and heritage then become the real drivers of change in the future. The Assembly therefore invites the Committee of Ministers and the European Union to intensify their exchanges in the future in order to increase their cooperation projects to promote European cultural values through technical assistance programmes and funding available for local and regional sustainable development projects that implement the principles of the Council of Europe Faro Convention and the European Heritage Strategy for the 21st Century.

³ Draft recommendation adopted unanimously by the committee on 22 January 2019.

C. Explanatory memorandum by Alexander Dundee, rapporteur

1. Introduction

1. As stated in the motion (Doc. 14026),⁴ “cultural diversity and the richness of cultural heritage are important assets for European economies and societies“. That is also supported by the Council of Europe Framework Convention on the Value of Cultural Heritage for Society (Faro Convention, 2005). This emphasises the importance of cultural heritage within national democracies and its scope for enriching daily life in their localities and communities.

2. The Brundtland Report⁵ defines sustainable development as that which meets the needs of the present without compromising those of the future. Thus how new and old cultures may be supported together to the advantage of all, and not least young people. Such is the central focus of this report.

3. In her report, “Culture and democracy”,⁶ Ms Vesna Marjanovic looks at the broad range of “culture“ and of what it really means; indicating how it embraces the spiritual, material, intellectual and emotional features which characterise every society. If so, the term includes not only cultural heritage, the arts and letters, but also life styles, habits of thinking and behaving, value systems, traditions and beliefs. Seen in this context, culture then becomes a powerful tool: to encourage constructive thought, to initiate public debate and to strengthen democratic practice.

4. This report urges decision makers to adopt the core principles of the Faro Convention at grass root levels: in order to boost local economies and assist the well-being of their communities.

5. It also identifies the issues and challenges which are to be addressed if proper progress should be made. For his useful work and contribution to that assessment, I should like to thank Professor Andrew Pratt, head of the department of cultural economy at London City University. I have also taken account of the outcomes of two hearings from meetings of the sub-committee on Culture, Diversity and Heritage: that in Aarhus on 4th April 2017 and that in London on 26th March 2018.

2. Cultural heritage: the reinvigoration of local economies and communities

6. Two successful examples of this are taken from London: firstly, the borough of Hackney where private initiatives have been supported by the local administration; secondly, the borough of Waltham Forest which has become part of a European project.

7. In Hackney conditions have steadily declined since the 1970s. The same may be true of a number of other London boroughs. For although some new jobs have been introduced, many more have been lost through deindustrialisation. As a result the area has demonstrated extremes: its population being divided between rich and poor, employed and unemployed, skilled and unskilled.⁷ At the same time, the local authority has performed badly, lacking competent leadership and nearly becoming bankrupt.

8. Fortunately, however, the position has now improved. This is largely due to investment into the arts and heritage. Spaces for creative endeavours have been made available. Consequently, this part of London (a crescent starting in Islington then extending through Hackney to east London) has become an epicentre of artistic and cultural production. Many of the participants even operate on an international level, although a number of them still survive on low incomes and struggle to find studios in the first place.⁸

9. However, Hackney’s recent success reflects constructive partnerships between business enterprise and the local authority; as it also does much more trust and confidence in what imaginative deployments of

⁴ On 19th April 2016 the Bureau of the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe referred this Motion for a Resolution to the committee on Culture, Science, Education and Media for report, presented by Alexander [the Earl of] Dundee.

⁵ UN Commission on Environment and Development (WCED) (1987), Our Common Future, OUP, Oxford.

⁶ PACE Resolution 2123 (2016) and Recommendation 2093 (2016) on “Culture and democracy”.

⁷ Gordon, I., Buck, N. Hall, P, Harloe, C, and Kleinman, M (2002). Working Capital: life and labour in contemporary London. London, Routledge.; Pratt, A. C. (1994). ‘Industry and employment in London’. Planning London. J. Simmie (Ed). London, UCL Press: 19-41.

⁸ Gordon, I., Buck, N. Hall, P, Harloe, C, and Kleinman, M (2002). Working Capital: life and labour in contemporary London. London, Routledge.; Pratt, A. C. (1994). ‘Industry and employment in London’. Planning London. J. Simmie (Ed). London, UCL Press: 19-41.

cultural heritage can do to stimulate employment in the open and cosmopolitan communities of this London borough.

10. That development has altered too the expectation of people of what culture can achieve. Previously it was often viewed as either irrelevant or else only of marginal benefit. Yet now, from within a borough such as Hackney, it is perceived instead to be a useful economic force and hence of value locally, nationally and internationally.

11. Unlike Hackney, which is an inner London borough, Waltham Forest is in the outer north east of the city. Being further from the centre it is much less well endowed. For example, within its boundaries there are no publicly funded art bodies at all. By contrast, Islington, which is close to Hackney, has 25 publicly funded institutions. And while deindustrialisation may have undermined the economies of many London boroughs, at least those nearer the centre such as Hackney have had a better chance of recovery compared with others out on a limb, such as Waltham Forest.

12. In 2018, the London Mayor launched a venture named “mini-European Capital of Culture (ECoC)”: London Borough of Culture. Waltham Forest won the first round of this initiative.⁹ Such competitions are often useful. Waltham Forest had to form its cultural bid from very little. As already indicted, that is since it is much worse off than other boroughs. Yet such comparative adversity proved to be an advantage instead. For thereby the borough was challenged to discover new networks, which had not been connected together before, let alone allied to the local authority; and moreover ones which previously had not even appeared to be cultural networks at all.

13. In summary, both these examples from Hackney and Waltham Forest show how cultural projects can reinvigorate local economies and communities, previously disconnected from their public authorities, thus re engaging those who have lost faith in top down government. They also illustrate the wide definition and relevant scope for cultural heritage itself to assist daily life.

3. Mainstreaming culture in governance

14. In the last decade or so, certain areas of culture and the economy have been acknowledged to contribute to local employment and income generation, as well as constitute cultural value.¹⁰

15. However, this new form of hybrid culture which includes heritage, as well as creative industries, may present a difficulty both to the not-for-profit, and for-profit spheres.

16. Whilst local authority culture departments are declining in size, and resource base,¹¹ in many aspects culture is more vibrant, sustained both by private resources, and as part of programmes run within other sectors such as health, transport, economic, and various other agencies. The aim is how to sustain a coherent strategic vision for culture, when its delivery is spread so widely in other sectors.

17. The “European Capital of Culture” is perhaps the best known venture engaging with urban regeneration and culture started by the European Commission. Yet it simply begun as an eulogy. This was to celebrate the diversity of European cultures as represented by cities. Since it was set up in 1985 the programme has inspired a significant growth in culture.¹² Such corresponding to current adaptations and redefinitions by localities and communities of their own particular cultural identities.

18. At first, the meetings moved around so that local cultures could be celebrated in different places. Thereby also its strength and diversity is revealed: by picking one area at a time where endeavours are centred and financed. Recently the scope has broadened encouraging even more participants and visitors. And now supplemented by community events as well. So while the European initiatives still last for six months a year, frequently they are taken up by cities to kick-start a separate longer-term project. Increasingly, the focus is not just upon historical heritage, but instead upon new cultural identities connected both to the past and to the future. Thereby it has become quite usual for these new programmes to express different types of cultural practice. They also manage to link with “non-cultural” activities such as health, transport, economic development and housing.

⁹ <https://www.london.gov.uk/what-we-do/arts-and-culture/current-culture-projects/london-borough-culture>.

¹⁰ Evans, G. (2001). Cultural planning: an urban renaissance? London, Routledge.

¹¹ Pratt, A. C. (2015). "Resilience, locality and the cultural economy." City, Culture and Society 6(3): 61-67. Pratt, A. (2017). "Beyond Resilience: Learning from the cultural economy." European Planning Studies 25(1): 127-139.

¹² https://ec.europa.eu/programmes/creative-europe/actions/capitals-culture_en.

19. Critics of the European Capital of Culture programme have highlighted what has contributed to its success. First, is the challenge of the bidding process. This brings many more than it used to. That is good for the community and for society. Many more stakeholders are involved. Added to which, a deadline is set. Yet even unsuccessful bidders benefit. For they find that the process itself leads to further projects. Connected to this, and secondly, there is good scope for networking between all the sectors of traditional and modern culture. Third, taking art in the European Capital of Culture has boosted the confidence and reputation of many cities, due to successful deployment of new collaborations, capacities and ambitions. Finally, whilst of course some expertise has come from outside, by and large those taking part consider that the source of energy and inspiration is where they are: and that they themselves have unlocked their own belonging, identity and skills, thus connecting to the whole community.

20. Looking across the European Capital of Culture project evaluations¹³ we may detect a positive yet refreshingly “light touch” approach from central administrations, and an ability by them to switch the focus according to local wishes. This broad attitude has assisted the programme’s development. There are now proper records. These show the diverse experiences of each European Capital of Culture event. And often this provides an insight into how culture has become a means of social, cultural and economic transformation. And this “learning network” of cities is the model now employed by UNESCO in its creative cities network which has 180 members.¹⁴ The perspective of European Capital of Culture programmes has also already extended beyond historical heritage, towards new cultural identities connected both to the past and the future. What too is convincing is that they manage to encompass “non-cultural” activities such as health, transport, economic development and housing.

21. This shift of perspective is striking: it proves that “culture” can be “rethought”. The process of listening and responding to the voice of local communities, enables local democracy to revive and become effective: and its citizens once more reengaged.

22. The lesson from the European Capital of Culture programme is that culture is valuable when it is not treated in an isolated or traditional way: that is as an “add-on” to an economic or social project. And that the European Capital of Culture programme can be both “a means and a method” for social engagement. It gives us a new understanding of what “mainstreaming” means, beyond the common usage of including a particular issue in all agendas; the lesson here is that culture can lead the overall initiative (local development strategy), and mobilise other sectors to provide support and participate.

4. The changing scope of culture

23. The last 50 years has seen a relaxation of the strict hierarchies between “high” and “low” culture; also between the for-profit, and not-for-profit activities. Previous attitudes opposing culture and economy are beginning to change. And a greater scope for “ordinary culture” has been recognised as of “value” to society. This has led to more people being included, and their interests being upheld by society.

24. Various types of initiatives have emerged. Some use culture as an expedient for social cohesion, health benefits and inter-cultural understanding. Others use it for economic development and urban regeneration. Others simply develop projects for their intrinsic cultural value.¹⁵

25. There are many tensions between the two spheres of activity, and even variations within cultural activities. Yet, increasingly, public bodies have been developing policies, regulations and institutions. These enable culture and economy to bring benefits for society.

26. A certain theme ran through case studies which were presented to the sub-committee in London. This was the way in which culture and heritage had altered and been reinvented. Yet such was not an academic exercise of redefinition, but instead one presented as a challenge to policy makers by relevant communities. Often it has conflicted with what public bodies have previously considered as culture, as well as that which has been formerly supported from public funds. However, culture, as a practice, has undergone a revolution in the last 25 years. The United Kingdom notably reveals this.¹⁶ However, that headline shift was heralded by a decade of initiatives in major cities: these activities focused on youth unemployment and re-engagement,

¹³ See Palmer-Rae Associates (2004). European Cities and Capitals of Culture. Brussels.

¹⁴ <https://en.unesco.org/creative-cities/home>.

¹⁵ Bianchini, F. and L. G. Santacatterina (1997). Culture and neighbourhoods. Strasbourg, Council of Europe Publishing. Bianchini, F. and M. Parkinson (1993). Cultural policy and urban regeneration: the West European experience. Manchester, Manchester University Press.

¹⁶ DCMS (1998). Creative industries mapping document. London, Department of Culture, Media and Sport, UK.

and upon the ways in which cultural employment may contribute to find a solution.¹⁷ The important insights were that culture was both a commercial and state funded activity creating social and economic impacts, and that the economic ones had previously been underestimated in terms of jobs and income, as well as in terms of the specific role of culture for regeneration.

27. This change had also affected cultural institutions, notably the attention to “new museology” which argued for a greater engagement of visitors and exhibits, and outreach into communities not previously benefitting from the museum experience.¹⁸ More generally, it corresponded to new ways of thinking about social policy, specifically the notion of “social exclusion”¹⁹. Social exclusion debates have stressed how inclusion in a wide range of activities underpins democracy and citizenship. The UK wove the new creative industries, cultural policy and social inclusion tightly together in its rethinking. Some felt it went too far, in that culture seemed to be expected to solve all society’s ills, neglecting “great culture”.²⁰ However, the overall legacy has been fresh thinking about what culture means: a redefinition going beyond previous boundaries of “high” and “low” culture; the “formal” and “informal”, as well as the “commercial” and “state funded”.

28. Nevertheless, it has not only been the UK, and lately the EU where a wider concept of culture has been discussed,²¹ the debate has also been taken up vigorously within the United Nations where its definition has also been broadened to address its ever changing nature, diversity, as well as its relationship to identity.²² The UK, like many nation states around the world, has renamed what was previously its “Department of National Heritage”, as the “Department for Digital, Culture, Media and Sport”. While such may be of interest symbolically, it also reveals good common sense in the preparedness to bring together diverse components of the “cultural ecosystem” under one roof. These changes have been generally slower to occur at local authority level.

5. Public – private partnerships and funding

29. In the United Kingdom, as public funding has been redirected toward other priorities, and the unit of resource has fallen, cultural agencies have been facing the problem of their survival. Recently, one local authority in the UK set a zero budget for culture. The report will show examples of innovative approaches to funding culture. Similar constraints on public funding are experienced in most, if not all, European countries. The level of public funding for all culture is falling globally, especially in those countries with austerity policies.²³ If institutions wish to thrive and survive they will have to find new ways of funding culture.

30. In the UK, local authorities, and individual institutions, have had to invent new methods in order to finance culture. Austerity measures have meant that some institutions have had to close while others have been staffed by volunteers. Most cultural institutions have had to re-direct monies from different sources. An example is the way in which culture can be used instrumentally as a means of promoting and enabling another function (health, transport, social inclusion, etc.). Some very positive outcomes have resulted from such mutual co-operation.²⁴

31. Other approaches are more controversial and potentially problematic; these are illustrated by sponsorship deals. Many national museums have such arrangements; some provide a substantial proportion of all funding for certain institutions. In a large one like the Tate, as much as 60% of annual funding comes from this source. However, sponsorship does not always work: many smaller institutions attract little if any of it all, especially those outside London. Even for the lucky institutions receiving sponsorship, managing the different stakeholder objectives and reputations can often be difficult. The real challenge is how to resolve

¹⁷ Pratt, A. C. (2005). “Cultural industries and public policy: An oxymoron?” International Journal of Cultural Policy 11(1): 31-44.

¹⁸ Vergo, P. (1989). The new museology. London, Reaktion Books.

¹⁹ Gallie, D. (2004). Resisting marginalization: Unemployment experience and social policy in the European Union, Oxford University Press.

²⁰ Belfiore, E. and O. Bennett (2008). The social impact of the arts: an intellectual history. Basingstoke, Palgrave Macmillan.

²¹ EU (2018) A new European agenda for culture COM(2018) 267 final.

²² UNCTAD (2010). The creative economy report. Creative economy, a feasible development option. Geneva/New York, UNCTAD/ UNDP.; UNESCO (2013). Creative economy report 2013 special edition: widening local development pathways. Paris, UNESCO/UNDP.

²³ Pratt, A. C. and T. A. Hutton (2013). “Reconceptualising the relationship between the creative economy and the city: Learning from the financial crisis.” Cities 33(0): 86-95.

²⁴ DCMS (1999). A report for Policy Action Team 10: Arts and Sport. National Strategy for Neighbourhood Renewal. London, Department of Culture, Media and Sport/Social Exclusion Unit, UK.

Doc. ...

differing objectives and to balance whatever rights the stakeholders may have in influencing content. Moreover, as has also been illustrated in London, there is a potential moral hazard to which institutions are exposed and this may devalue them by association.²⁵

32. A recent example concerned those protesting against BP's activities, and their sponsorship of the Tate. Activists wanted the Tate to disassociate itself from BP, and its money, which they claimed was financing environmental damage.

33. This highlights the tension between art and money. As it happened, the origin of modern state cultural policy in the UK was the establishment of the Arts Council in 1946, reflecting the principle of the "buffer" between art and the State: called the "arm's length principle". Governance rules may exist to create such a buffer with private interests; however as in the case of BP, they did not insulate the Tate from damage to its reputation.²⁶ Institutions are having to navigate this complex hinterland between State and market. That leads to the current challenges of cultural governance and representation (of art forms, and communities). Institutions are often pushed to the "front line" to make decisions which were previously taken by central government or mandated by funding. Furthermore, these institutions are no longer fully "public" and the balance between "accountable" interests is often difficult to make. It will require new skills and training for administrators beyond the traditional curatorial skills, or public management expertise as well as potentially new terms of governance and accountability for institutions.

6. Employment and skills

34. Employment in the cultural sector is expanding at above the average rate for all other employment. Cultural jobs are becoming a key part of Europe's future.²⁷ Yet, the education and skills agenda has still to catch up with this new trend. Most government agencies promote Science, Technology and Engineering at the expense of Arts and Cultural subjects. More specifically we have seen the withdrawal of many craft activities from the school curriculum. However, it is only through a combination of arts and science that creativity or technologies are manifest as products or experiences.²⁸

35. The question is not simply to provide adequate training or education but to expand the range of skills. Crafts offer a huge repository of skills that have been set aside in favour of a new technique. Nevertheless, skills are multivalent: they can be used and reused in different contexts. Preserving those which are required in heritage projects, or just that are not often used, is to provide necessary resource for the future. This has been part of the Council of Europe Technical Co-operation and Consultancy Programs (TCCP).²⁹ Maintaining skills is part of community building, a way of passing knowledge from one generation to another, and of conserving heritage itself.

36. Craft skills can also engender new jobs, especially for the youth. Witness the rise of the "maker movement" opening up new spaces that use technologies and creativity to repair, revise and refashion products, as well as to make uniquely special ones. Also, maker spaces can be sites for learning, and continuous learning, as well as a means to nurture and teach local craft skills and techniques.

37. Local authorities on the edge of great cities, like Thurrock in the outer London area, have experienced de-industrialisation; be that as it may, they have not generally experienced the rapid economic re-growth of inner London. The "economic ecosystem" that has previously linked community, school, employment and home has been severed.³⁰

38. The High House scheme at Thurrock assessed the problem of finding new work for the youth in a "broken" economic ecosystem. The solution was perhaps surprisingly to attract the Royal Opera House (ROH) stage set-building facility to Thurrock. This is an activity that requires craft skills. In order to proceed High House set up a partnership between the ROH and the local schools and training. This partnership

²⁵ BP sponsorship of Tate Britain. <https://www.independent.co.uk/arts-entertainment/art/news/bp-to-end-controversial-sponsorship-of-tate-in-2017-a6923471.html>.

²⁶ BP ended its 26 year old sponsorship deal with Tate in 2017. Both parties denied that public pressure had any effect. <https://www.theguardian.com/artanddesign/2016/mar/11/bp-to-end-tate-sponsorship-climate-protests>.

²⁷ KEA European Affairs (2006). The economy of culture in Europe. Brussels, European Commission DG5.

²⁸ <http://theconversation.com/steam-not-stem-why-scientists-need-arts-training-89788>.

²⁹ J.Bold, and R.Pickard (eds) (2018) "AN INTEGRATED APPROACH TO CULTURAL HERITAGE", Council of Europe.

³⁰ In Thurrock it is port-related industries, in which almost everybody worked; in other places it is car manufacture (like neighbouring Dagenham), or classically coal-mining communities. These dominant employers create an ecosystem which when operating is very effective. However, with the failure of such employers or activities all social and economic support infrastructure collapses and it is very hard to re-build.

together with the skills of “brokering” to achieve resilience proved to be effective. In order to bridge the gaps of aspiration, expertise and activity new words and job descriptions were invented. For the way that people and their jobs are talked about can often help or hinder engagement in the first place. High House were also prepared to accept a “DIY mindset”. This enabled a flexible and unorthodox response to problems, and as they said, to “create their own luck”.³¹

39. The Borough of Islington, neighbouring Hackney, and is quite similar; it has publicly funded bodies, has been ill served by its local administration and it is diverse ethnically as well as economically (having some of London’s richest, as well as poorest citizens). Central to Islington’s cultural initiatives have been two aims: fairness of opportunity and the delivery of employment. Instead of a traditional agenda of “skills matching”, or “improved exam results”, the focus has been on the entitlement of excluded communities. This notion of entitlement reflects what has been lost: the previous aspiration now diminished, the expectation of not getting jobs, or not “deserving” certain types of jobs, especially in the cultural economy. Survey data have shown that all sectors of culture are insufficiently represented by working class people, ethnic minorities and women.³² Young people within those categories are thus held back: thereby also curtailed in London is the growth of the creative industries, which although successfully developing to some extent, would otherwise do so much more. As it is, Islington has mobilised its 65 schools into a “community”. The purpose of this is to better enable employment and job experience. There are as well 25 publicly funded art agencies. A partnership has been forged with the schools giving pupils experiences of the cultural sector. Previously, such would have taken them to the theatre, or to a museum. Now it is to find work. Not least are the problems of skills shortage and local employment reduced as a result.

40. These examples illustrate the good effects of “real” partnerships formed by common interest and which carry a long-term commitment to the community. It is through such partnerships that “new pathways” can be forged: bringing in young people and allowing the community to re-engage with work and culture.

7. Cultural vitality and its impact on democracy

41. Cultures should reflect diversity of skills, responsive ideas and be outward looking. They should also include the willingness and aptitude for dealing with everyday problems and challenges.

42. A culture on emergent shared values and ideas builds us a unique resource from which all can benefit. Europe’s cultural history is an accessible resource, but a new culture is necessary for the future, one which includes sustainable development, and which can be passed on to the next generation.

43. We have to examine ways and means for enabling culture and economy to combine to support diversity. This affects society as a whole. We therefore need to examine the tools that have been used as part of cultural and heritage programmes: this is to enable the population to appreciate and make choices in a diverse environment.

44. Tate Modern might well claim to bridge the gap between culture, heritage and democracy. Now one of the most visited tourist attractions in the UK, it is also close to many other cultural institutions within the London borough of Southwark. Developers are attracted even though there is still much poor housing. Old warehouses, relics of the disused docks, have already been converted into valuable apartments. All the same here is a slight inconsistency. For thereby within the area the gap between affluence and poverty has marginally widened. Therefore, to some although limited extent, the Tate Modern may have unintentionally exacerbated the very problem which otherwise it had sought to minimise.³³

45. In handling the relationship between art, society and government, the Tate adopts a radical approach. Tate Exchange is a programme which enables 60 partners to work within and without the art world. Traditional “outreach” organises school visits to galleries and talks at schools. Yet the Tate has broadened this endeavour. Now the community is involved. Spaces are offered and staff are available to assist. As a result the scope has become greater for art to benefit the locality. Issues recently addressed include improved housing, work, citizenship and social democracy. Tate Liverpool and Tate Modern are equally active. Each looks at ways to help their communities through art.

³¹ The ‘spillover’ of this development is the creation of new artists’ studios by another third sector provider, ACME, on the same site.

³² Oakley, K., Laurison, D, O’Brien, D and Friedman, S. (2017). “Cultural Capital: Arts Graduates, Spatial Inequality, and London’s Impact on Cultural Labor Markets.” American Behavioral Scientist 61(12): 1510-1531.

³³ Dean, C., Donnellan, C and Pratt A.C. (2010). “Tate Modern: pushing the limits of regeneration.” City, Culture and Society 1(2): 79-87.

46. This shows how cultural institutions are adapting. Yet the revised attitude is not assertive. Instead it invites questions and debate: for example how art can do more to help people wherever they live, not least taking into account the importance of maintaining a certain balance within society which is increasingly multicultural. That is to engender appreciation and respect for the difference between histories and practices of cultures. That approach has already proved effective in reducing conflict in war zones as it also has in decreasing tensions in other contexts; such as in our cities where culture represents a means to negotiate a variety of challenges.³⁴

8. Specific situation in rural and remote areas

47. Cultural heritage and cultural activities mainly apply to cities, as also do the benefits of knowledge exchange.

48. Rural and remote communities should have proper access to culture: including touring companies and now live theatre enabled through new technology. Nevertheless, clearly political resolve is required in the first place. This is as much as possible to protect and encourage the right of rural society to equality of access and opportunity.

49. Remote areas often lack sufficient investments in training, skills and resources. As a result, young people are all the more likely to leave to find work in the cities.

50. It has been alleged that too much funding goes to large conurbations and the national capital city itself. If so this would disadvantage regions, drawing people away from them. In any case and owing to the greater opportunities there afforded artists and cultural practitioners would always be expected to move and operate within cities. UK cultural policy has tried to protect regions, where it has set up national institutions. Another intervention has been "NT Live". This is a digital capture of live theatre that is re-broadcast in local cinemas in the regions.

51. However, while such initiatives may offer a wider spread of activities there, they have done little to reverse the "cultural drain" from the regions. Their cultural practices are now under threat due to both a lack of funding and absence of skilled people. One response has been to develop outdoor museums. Up to a point this keeps the display of activities "alive" and creates some jobs. Yet it falls well short of supporting a vibrant cultural economy.

52. The challenge here is to sustain craft skills for which there appears to be no current market. Keeping them going is not simply about finding a market. It also requires learning, the training of new workers and passing on skills. The crafts can provide jobs, and they enhance cultural diversity. On the other hand, if unique skills and practices are allowed to decline then they are likely to disappear forever.

53. Closely connected to the consideration of skills and crafts is that of livelihoods. Housing represents another threat to artists and cultural workers. Frequently it is far too expensive especially for young families. Consequently, artists and other low paid workers cannot afford to live in big cities. Affordable housing, linked to cultural and heritage-based employment is therefore essential. This is in order to sustain rural communities and their cultures. An initiative which has developed in the UK is artist run, or artist owned housing and workshops.³⁵ The idea is to remove property from the "market" via third sector ownership to protect cultural workers from housing and workshop inflation.

9. Conclusions

54. This report has highlighted seven challenges which underpin the present and future relationship between the value of cultural heritage and democracy. The report acquired expert input from senior policy makers from local authorities in London, which have been experiencing problems, confronting these with innovative and effective responses. However, policy initiatives still must take into account local legislative, social, cultural and economic particulars and details. Any such solutions cannot be simply copied; but, they can be adopted as processes which are then able to act as templates for awkward problems experienced elsewhere.

³⁴ Wood, P. and C. Landry (2007). The intercultural city: planning for diversity advantage. London; Sterling, VA, Earthscan; Robins, K. (2006). The challenge of transcultural diversities: transversal study on the theme of cultural policy and cultural diversity: final report. Strasbourg, Council of Europe Pub.

³⁵ Two examples of successful organizations in the UK are ACME and SPACE.

55. The seven challenges that are identified engender a range of insights into the cultural heritage-democracy relationship. It is important to note that all three key terms – culture, democracy and heritage – are dynamic and changing. Heritage is often thought of as “the past”. By using the notion of sustainability, we can recognise that tomorrow’s heritage must be created today. There is a link between past, present and future which ought to be managed. This has been emphasised both in connection with cultural employment and with how we learn to understand culture in the first place.

56. Culture and our assessment of it are subject to change: not just new forms of cultural expression or new tools and techniques of communication. For we re-evaluate the past in the context of the present. The idea of social inclusion as part of democracy is central. Previously the notion of “national culture” was upheld by nation States and empires. Today instead we tend to construe it as a source and proof of diversity within healthy democracies. Maintaining such diversity in the present yet properly understanding the past as well is the key challenge. Once this balance has been achieved then communities will prosper. Genuine diversity has to encompass different viewpoints and perspectives corresponding to a wide range of cultures

57. Entitlement to culture is a way of expressing the “ownership” of culture. This is why cultural heritage is not simply about artefacts in museums, or even skills and jobs. For in an increasingly cosmopolitan society heritage is both personal as well as community focused. Heritage is about identity, not just a political label. It is the experience of the family and community roots, and that of journeys from a previous home to the current one. This flux and its ever extending “reach” throughout the world presents fresh opportunities across housing, work and leisure.

58. In the examples given we can see why local authorities must heed current demands as well as respect those of past, and distant, communities. Local authorities have started to strike this balance within the conduct of civic administration. It has been indicated how culture touches and mobilises people, and not least in times of economic uncertainty or decline, how it can also re-ignite hope, identity and belonging; for people to earn new respect and to be fired with fresh ambition.

59. It also affords the opportunity to transform a problem into a solution. But to do so, and in the first place, we need to introduce culture and heritage into mainstream thinking about social and economic change. For hitherto the perception of culture has often been rather more as a charming ingredient for adding “fun” or “respectability” to projects otherwise devoid of too much appeal. Yet on the contrary, these examples show how culture should be front and centre, so that other parts of the economy and of society may be used as means for promoting the right form of cultural heritage: which we would then wish to pass on to future generations.